Reading

Of the estimated 700 species of spiders found in the continental United States, only two are known to be deadly to humans: the black widow and the brown recluse. The former is found throughout the lower 48 states, though it is more common to the milder climate of the south and west. The black widow is easily recognized by red hourglass-shaped mark on its lower abdomen. This mark is more prevalent in females than in the smaller males, which usually just have a light stripe. The bite of the black widow is described as being incredibly painful, so much so that not even morphine is 100 % effective in treating the pain. Not despite its painful bite, the black widow is seldom deadly, though it can be fatal to small children or the elderly. The brown recluse bite, on the other hand, has no treatment. This spider is found along the south and west of the country, and it is a fearsome arachnid indeed. Though, in keeping with its name, the species is rarely seen, it will bite if pressed against the skin, as might happen if the spider finds its way inside clothing or bedding. The brown recluse's bite is frequently not felt, and it may only be after the appearance of a large wound that the victim will even realize he or she was bitten. The wound will become painful within a few hours, with necrosis developing over the next few days.

1. A suitable title for this passage might be:

  - b. Only spiders with a color in their names are poisonous,
  - c. The bite of the black widow should not be deadly to an average healthy adult,
  - d. All spiders will bite if threatened.
3. It can be inferred from the paragraph that morphine
  - a. Is a painkiller,
  - b. Is only given to victims of black widow bites,
  - c. Is a controlled substance,
  - d. Is highly addictive.
4. What is the first indication that someone has been bitten by a brown recluse?
